

The Global Politics of Sexual and Reproductive Health

MARIA TANYAG

THE GLOBAL POLITICS OF SEXUAL AND REPRODUCTIVE HEALTH

This book examines everyday inequalities in sexual and reproductive health and rights (SRHR), and the failure to address them in crisis settings from a feminist international relations (IR) perspective. It seeks to address the puzzle of why inequalities and barriers to SRHR continue to exist within a wider political context where the importance of gender equality has never been more accepted, and women are represented as central to major global agendas. In the increasingly crisis-prone world we live in today, the neglect of health and particularly women's health and well-being, seems counter-intuitive. The significance of SRHR for global peace and security is often hidden or underexamined.

Features

- Advances an innovative theoretical approach on the 'neoliberal logic of depletion' to demonstrate why sexual and reproductive health matters for contemporary approaches to peace, security, and political economy
- Proposes the concept of regeneration as a form of feminist peace that emerges when bodily autonomy is central to post-crisis recovery and reconstruction
- Generates critical insights for bridging women's health interventions during crisis with gender equality in peace processes and post-disaster recovery and response
